INVESTING IN LONG-TERM SUSTAINABILITY

“Wine growing in the region has to be sustainable,” Jean-Claude Mas explains. “You have to have the economic aspect in place. Wine growers have to make money, to make quality wine. “By relying on already established vineyards, Domaine Paul Mas gains higher quality older vine fruit. At the same time, he benefits from the lower cost of vineyards already owned by their families. But the approach also boosts the environmental health of the Languedoc. “Domaine Paul Mas has a sustainable viticulture guidebook to follow for contracted vineyards,” Mas says. The winery provides education to vineyard owners on sustainable viticulture, while also paying them more than they’d receive selling still conventionally farmed fruit elsewhere. By contracting with vineyard owners, Mas ensures that the people that control the region’s land have a reliable income that also depends on their long-term shift to sustainable viticulture. “It’s all connected,” Mas tells me. “To be environmentally sustainable, we have to first be economically sustainable. We are working towards all organic. We can not continue to destroy our environment.”
